

Recent court opinions have used forum analysis to resolve speech claims at public colleges and universities in a wide variety of settings, such as speech zones, meeting rooms, email systems, bulletin boards, display cases, alumni magazines, stage productions, and student picketing. Not all of these courts, however, first walked through the prerequisite analytical steps. This article discusses both those threshold steps and the components of forum analysis in order to help counsel draw constitutional lines between free and regulated speech on campus.