

The extent of student's free speech rights at public universities has received extensive judicial and academic attention, but little has been said regarding the intersecting First Amendment claims of political speech and academic freedom at issue in student officer elections. This note attempts to sort through the judicial deference principle common in elementary and secondary education cases, and to examine it in light of the strict scrutiny normally required for restrictions on campaign expenditures.