

The drafting and enforcement of faculty disciplinary policies pose numerous challenges. This article discusses the use of discipline in nonacademic organizations, the development of standards for higher education faculty conduct, and litigation by faculty members who have undergone some form of formal discipline (short of dismissal). It suggests a series of considerations for faculty members and administrators, including crafting and implementing disciplinary policies, using informal resolution and alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, and drafting strategies for such policies.