

This article explores disability discrimination claims by academically dismissed law students. In part because of the Supreme Court's new, strict standards for defining who has a legal disability, and because of courts' deference to law schools' academic readmissions decisions even where a disability is claimed, dismissed students' disability discrimination claims have been notably unsuccessful. The article includes guidelines for law schools to make principled readmissions decisions which comply with disability laws.