

This article examines whether public and private institutions of higher education have the authority to withhold academic degrees already earned or to revoke academic degrees already conferred for acts of academic dishonesty or for student misconduct. It also discusses the procedural safeguards required to ensure fairness in withholding or revocation procedures and analyzes the degree of deference given to educational institutions in making such decisions.