

This article examines the current use of student evaluations as a measure of teaching ability. More specifically, the article analyzes the legal issues associated with the use of student evaluations. Some of these issues include concerns regarding the rights of faculty, substantive due rights concerns, and disquiet regarding the treatment of students as de facto experts.