

In The Law of Higher Education Dennis Farrington and David Palfreyman present a wealth of material about higher education in the United Kingdom. It is argued, however, that their work is significantly flawed because it is colored by a 'consumerist' perspective which views education as a 'product' of 'corporate enterprise'. This review article attempts to redress the balance and provide a more objective basis of analysis.