

In 1966, Charles Whitman shot and killed fourteen people from the top of the University of Texas' clock-tower—an event that forever changed the landscape associated with student mental health. This note analyzes modern responses by colleges and universities to student mental health threats and the historical evolution of college and university liability for student behavior. The note also examines developing legal standards related to student mental health issues and how these standards may impact colleges and universities.