

As globalization continues to affect education, colleges and universities will be under increasing pressure to create new international programs. The creation of international externship programs allows the university to create a low cost, low risk opportunity for students to learn through cultural immersion. This article analyses the university's duty to its students and to the externship placement sites and sets for best practices for minimizing the university's risk of liability in international externship programs.